Peace of Mind

Two Sundays ago our college minister chose "Peace of Mind" for the subject of his sermon. Such a timely subject should have been an inducement enough for each student to forego the new-found freedom of being able to miss chapel exercises, and want to hear how such a theme might have been developed. It was, therefore, with some surprise that one noted less than 800 students and faculty members in the audience. In the 15 or 20 minutes left, after devotion, for the sermon, Mr Phillip listed four or five ways through which peace of mind, the ideal, might become a reality for the individual.

The minister's clear logic, developed without benefit of histrionics, hit at the very root of the reason for our enormous failure to win the peace. Despite the deliberations of our somewhat grandiose United Nations organization the kind of peace most of us want has never been further away. A person left chapel that morning knowing that peace was a personal problem, and convinced that until each individual diligently sought peace of mind, peace in our time will remain a dream.

Walking homeward after chapel one might have noticed how the sun, some wind-blown tree leaves, and the sidewalk between Anderson and Evans combined to make a number of beautifully patterned silhouettes. And for a split second the realization thundered from out of nowhere that such a sermon plus a community of people plus concentrated effort might have been combined to make a pattern for a nation, or a world to copy.
