BEAT WILEYYOUR WEEK

One God, One World, and One Man

It is generally recognized that some force, a Prime Mover, a beginning principle, or God, set the universe into motion. Philosophers, long before the birth of Christ argued the idea of multi-gods into obsolescence, and although various faiths call Him different names, there is currently extant the One God concept.

Wendell Wilkie's ONE WORLD set us right, to say the least, spatially. This written record of his travels left no doubt, in even the denser minds, that the great land masses of our planet are only hours apart. His work indicated further that people in each country he visited wanted most, oddly enough, the wholesome things we want for ourselves. Mr Wilkie's conceptual grasp of One World was (and is) based upon irrevocable fact.

Sinclair Lewis has Neil Kingsblood in KINGSBLOOD ROYAL, not too deftly, lift some of the epidermal scabs off the ineptly called "Negro problem." Poor Kingsblood never seems to realize that his problem is as ageless as time itself; one that will defy solution until all men under One God in one world realize intelligibly that we must be as one.

Paradoxically enough, even with our finite minds we accept the infiniteness of God, even while rejecting the physical evidence of the possibility of a brotherhood of man. The apparent solidity of our earth impresses its "oneness" upon us.

When do we begin to act, in accord with established knowledge, that we are One?
